“We experimented with an early prototype of HyperMotion as part of our previous FUT World Cup title and the results were so promising we wanted to take it to the next level for FIFA 22,” said Aaron McHardy, Development Director for EA SPORTS FIFA Football. “Our top goal is to make the game feel realer than ever before. There is a great deal of authenticity in the experience and what our team has accomplished with this new technology has been incredible.” Improved Movement The refined AI (artificial intelligence) in FIFA 22 is powered by an AI engine for FIFA 15 – the same AI engine used in FUT Worlds, FUT, and FUT Champions – but has been upgraded to handle the added complexities of gameplay. This improved AI makes for a more realistic and nuanced experience, making the game easier to control. There’s no learning curve for new players, as the game makes it easier to move forwards, backwards, up and down, left and right and diagonally, and in any direction. The same speed and directional feeling is maintained across all surfaces, including grass, grassy surfaces and artificial turf. For the first time, FIFA players will be able to control the impact of their movement with more precision. This is a result of the motion capture work done by EA SPORTS FIFA Football and its motion capture producer, Andreas Szekeres. There are now more control parameters for players to set before making a move: you can create a more accurate jump with options such as height and timing, get more precision in a sprint by setting acceleration and deceleration, or aim to control an opponent and predict where they’ll move next. This increases control of your player’s run and movement. Players who put more energy into performing a tackle will usually win a greater number of free kicks and more successful tackles will result in more goals. These tackles need to be performed on high-energy play, so players who want to win more free kicks and interceptions can make a greater effort to execute more high-energy challenges. In the first-person view, players can move with more flair and urgency, making it easier to put on a run or turn when needed. Several improvements were made to the player animations, making them more connected to the ball and allowing players to make more intricate plays. “The players look more connected to the ball and the ball moves more naturally through the gaps,💎
